

Notes on Contributors

RYAN LANG-ANTONOPOULOS is a senior at the University of Florida with a passion for constitutional law, American government, and presidential history. His academic interests include the evolution of presidential power, Supreme Court precedent, and the intersection of law and politics in shaping American governance. Fascinated by American presidential and election history, he also studies the methodology of political division in the United States. Ryan has experience as an intern at the Broward State Attorney's Office, has been published in several political journals, and has participated in research opportunities that deepen his understanding of the law and its application in political institutions and elections. Dedicated to pursuing a career in academia, Ryan plans to study law and government in law school or graduate school, with the goal of contributing to the understanding of constitutional development and the role of the presidency in American political institutions.

ANDI BETTINGER is a fourth-year pre-law student at the University of Florida. She is deeply interested in the intersection of law, business, and healthcare policy, particularly how regulatory frameworks impact market competition and accessibility. With a focus on pharmaceutical pricing, patents, and FDA processes, she explores how legal strategies and corporate practices shape the healthcare landscape. She also has a broader interest in legal topics related to antitrust law, administrative law, intellectual property, and First Amendment law.

ALLISON FOWLER, a University of Florida student, is pursuing a double major in Economics and Political Science, in conjunction with a double minor in Mass Communications and Public Relations. Before attending law school, she will earn a master's degree in Mass Communications. She aims to work for a federal agency with a long-term goal by contributing to pro-bono legal work. Her academic interests focus on behavioral economics, domestic policy, and corporate law.

JACOB JAHREIS is a junior at the University of Florida majoring in Business Administration with a specialization in Urban Geography and minors in Real Estate and Economics. A native of Windermere, Florida, he is passionate about real estate, history, economics, geography, and the evolving role of artificial intelligence. With plans to explore opportunities in real estate law through a JD/MSRE pathway, he aims to combine his academic background and diverse interests to shape innovative real estate solutions.

KARA PUGLIESE is a pre-law senior at the University of Florida, double majoring in Biology and Psychology with a minor in Sociology of Social Justice and Policy. With a scientific background and firsthand experience in research processes, she is deeply interested in the legal dynamics at the crossroads of science, technology, and commerce. Kara aspires to contribute to a legal system that promotes collaboration and sustainable growth in innovation-driven industries.

ROSEMAY WALLACE is a senior criminology and sociology student at the University of Florida. By assessing how legal interpretations and societal decisions continuously influence each other, she explores how legal frameworks can evolve to effectively address contemporary issues. She plans to go to law school, where she can further focus on her interests in criminal law, media law, and constitutional law.