

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE

Thomas D. Boswell is a professor of geography at the University of Miami. His research interests include population, social, and urban geography. He has written extensively about Caribbean minority groups living in the United States.

Donald Brandes is an assistant professor at the University of Alabama. His academic interests are climatology, water resources, and cartography. Don has a Ph.D. from the University of Florida and, although living elsewhere, remains very much a Florida geographer.

Alan Craig, a frequent contributor to the Florida Geographer book review section, is a professor at Florida Atlantic University.

Steven E. Dicks (Ph.D., University of Florida) is a research associate at the Remote Sensing and Image Processing Laboratory at the University of Florida. His research interests include remote sensing applications in tropical deforestation and coastal plain geomorphology.

Lydia Golden received her B.S. from Syracuse University and her M.S. from Queens College, New York. Currently she is working with a research team investigating the history of Jewish people in Florida.

James A. Henry (Ph.D., University of Kansas) is an associate professor of geography at the University of Florida. His current research efforts include urban climatology and the application of satellite data to climatological and ecological problems.

Beth Kirk, a social studies teacher in Dade County, received her BAE from the University of Florida. She was chosen as Teacher of the Year from her school in 1985-86. Her interests include physical and cultural geography.

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE

Sherry Maer is an occupational specialist for the Dade County Public Schools (McMillan Jr. High). She received her B.A. in psychology, and her M.S. in vocational education from Florida International University. Her interests include career education and cultural geography.

Ira M. Sheshkin is an associate professor of geography at the University of Miami. His research interests include urban and transportation problems. He has written extensively about the design and use of survey research techniques and has been active as a consultant in South Florida.

John W. Stafford is an associate professor of geography at the University of South Florida. His interests include population, American Indians, and other ethnic groups. He received his Ph.D. from Michigan State University in 1971.

Carroll V. Truss is a professor of psychology at the University of Miami. His research interests include surveys and questionnaire design for attitudinal surveys. He has been active as a consultant in Dade county for the past thirty years.

Gerald (Jerry) R. Webster is an assistant professor at the University of Wyoming. His interests are in political, social, and urban geography. He received his Ph.D. from the University of Kentucky in 1984.

Roberta Haven Webster is a lecturer at the University of Wyoming and a Ph.D. candidate at the University of Kentucky. Her interests include social, urban, and economic geography.

Marie L. York is an economist planner working for the City of Boca Raton. She received her bachelor's degree in economics with a specialty in urban and regional planning. Her M.A. is also in economics from Florida Atlantic University.